

Teamsters Reject Unionization with Teamsters

If unionization sounds too good to be true, then it probably is.

That's what truck drivers in Wisconsin realized after years of unionization under the Teamsters.

Wisconsin truck driver with Keurig Dr Pepper explains vote to decertify Teamsters union

Ray Cotts, a 20-year driver for the company who supported ending the union, said after the vote that he looks forward to improved flexibility and benefits. Cotts said the union's five-year contracts had locked him into wages and benefits that became outdated with economic changes, such as inflation.

"Teamsters officials didn't listen to us and didn't represent our interests in the workplace," Garcia said in a statement. "My coworkers and I decided that the best way forward was to vote them out, and we're glad we could get legal aid from the National Right to Work Foundation in exercising our rights."
